

Published based on Cabin Crew Staff coaching

Cabin Crew Staff coaching

Cabin crew coaching is not all about emergency landings - flight attendants also have to learn masses of folk and communication abilities.

Lots of websites offer cabin crew coaching, but while completing one of those courses might give you an edge during recruitment, every airline considers training an investment and pay sign ups a wage to pass with flying colors.

All airlines ask expect recruits to have a basic education "four GCSEs or equivalent is a standard entry requirement "and that they can swim.

Any extra languages are worth brushing up and might help push you up the queue for a selected job and bonus pay.

Working as cabin crew is about two things above all else: the safety and comfort of passengers.

Naturally, safety is most important, and if you manage to get one of those coveted positions, dealing with emergencies will be the main focus of your pre-flight training.

All flight attendants have to,,complete the Civil Aviation Authority safety and emergency procedures course.

Though tackling an emergency is improbable, the topics covered are a harsh reminder of the responsible disposition you want to bring to a cabin crew job.

They include:

- Abandoning an airplane
- Landing on water
- Decompression
- Fighting fires
- Passenger management
- Security
- Survival and first aid abilities.

The remainder of the coaching is a ton less exciting, but vital however.

Much of a flight attendant's work is about getting together with people, good manners and enjoying providing a service.

Staying calm and respectful while understanding some of us have a fear of flying or react badly to the strain of sitting with masses of others for hours at a time is all just a part of the job.

If you want to join an airline cabin crew, but are not sure if the job is right for you, there are some important points to bear in mind before you apply for a job.

Airlines need cabin crew who can keep smiling and act professionally under these sometimes troublesome conditions - and if that is you and you meet the basic job requirements, then apply immediately. Visit www.travelvocation.com

You can also find this article published on Cabin Crew Staff coaching, and on the tag pages cabin, cabin crew job, emergency landings, Flight, harsh reminder, Safety.