In the United States, as in most countries, passports are issued by the Department of State. The State Department oversees all issues concerning international relationships and policies. Passports are one portion of this department's responsibilities.

The historical details of passports can be fascinating. Heads of State issued letters to their messengers and envoys in order to provide them with state protection as they took on international tasks. Nowadays, governments enlist passports out of concern for national security and immigration. For US citizens who wish to go abroad, passports are required before leaving the country.

Most passports, regardless of country, are fairly similar in look as they all strive to meet an international standard. The majority of US passports come with twenty-four pages allowing for entry and exit visa stamps. A stamp is added each time you enter or leave a country. Many people like to collect stamps from different countries; they make it a point to enter and exit at different points so that their books will be filled with a variety of international stamps.

If you have traveled a lot, you may find that your pages for stamps are nearly filled. This is a special problem for those planning to travel on short notice. Thankfully, if you meet the conditions, it is possible to add pages to your passport. But if your book has more than four blank pages, you are not eligible to obtain any more. However, if you have four or fewer pages, you can apply for more by submitting the appropriate forms to the Department of State.

You can get the form needed to request extra pages from the State Department website or from various offices about the country. The information required is simple identification stuff and emergency contact numbers. Also, the form is free and can be submitted by mail or on line. Your passport will also have to be sent to the State department offices before your request is complete.

The State Department is a tremendous government operation that receives thousands of passport requests. Since these are not the only duties maintained by the office, you should not expect a speedy turnaround time. Most requests take at least a month. This is the central problem for those with sudden travel plans. Luckily, it is possible to request expedited service. Your passport with extra pages can be returned sooner, but this rushed service will cost an extra sixty dollars.
